Q.4

Read the passage and answer the questions given below:

(15)

I praise above all others the life of habit, order and discipline, and I disagree vehemently with Montaigne when he declares that a "young man should break in upon his rules, to stir up energy and keep it from becoming mouldy and lazy; for no course of life is so foolish and feeble as that which is carried out according to rules and discipline." This may have been a good enough advice for a gentleman of private means in the sixteenth century, but it is of no use to a generation that has discovered the beauty of machines and must more and more conform itself to the beautiful and orderly ways of machines. Give me the train that starts punctually, the clock that habitually tells the right time, the man who breakfasts at eight sharp every morning and always carries his ticket in the same pocket. To live like a machine in all those matters does not matter___ this is to live successfully. To live mechanically is to be a free spirit, unclogged by the constant necessity of turning aside from the proper business of life to engage in a silly hunt books and spectacles. I thank my stars that I have at least one habit, if it is only the habit of opening the cigarette packet in one particular way, it is a small thing, but may it not be the seed of punctuality, order and discipline that will ultimately spread through my whole being? All is not lost. The west-country wailer has given me hope. (write your answers as fast as possible in your own words. Your answers should be in brief and to the point)

Questions:

- i) What type of life does the author favour in this passage?
- ii) On which point does the author disagree with Montaigne?
- iii) What has the author to say in contradiction to Montaigne's views on habits?
- iv) What arguments did Montaigne advance to condemn the life of rules?
- v) How does the author justify the life of habits?

Q.4

Read the following passage and answer the questions given below:

(15)

The above hading requires no explanation; it is easily understood by everyone. One might not easily grant its truth. We are generally partial to ourselves; we overlook, minimize our faults and exaggerate our merits, and have too high an opinion of ourselves.

In any department where a number of people work, every man is apt to think highly of his own work, and consider it of equal importance with that of another, if not superior to that of another thus he might be dissatisfied with the position assigned to him or the emoluments given to him. In such circumstances, we might usefully remember that other are better judges of our merits than ourselves.

Answer the following questions set on the above passage:

- a) What is the general opinion of one's own merits?
- b) How does one think of oneself in the midst of other about work, position and emoluments etc?
- c) How should one decide things for the judgment of this merits or demerits in such circumstances?
